A H.A.L.O. Joint

To have had experience, first hand, one needs to have seen, with ones own eyes, the repercussions of control, and lack thereof. Before one has this experience, one is truly a ship without a rudder. It is only the “why”s and “wherefore”s that lead to control. In this case, truly, the only way to know what is enough, is to know what is too much.

It is not evil, in this sense, to push limits, and to fill oneself with impurities; it only shows inexperience, and ignorance of the real Laws. The way of oppression is never the Way, either individually or in a society. Man must be allowed to manifest, such that he be allowed to grow. That being said, there comes a point when man, after having soiled himself in the pursuit of “Forbidden Fruit”, gives it up for a higher purpose.

In this sense, the West displays innocence, and foolhardiness, in its mindless yet unwavering pursuit of gratification of the physical senses. It is in contrast with Islam, which displays knowledge of the human tendencies, but deals with them by forbidding them to their folk, thus causing a disbalance within society, what they had sought to avoid. Men and women should be allowed to manifest, but self-control of the individual, and of society, must also be the goal. Self-control, not capitalism, not communism, not democracy, monarchy, anarchy, but self-control.

The key lies in control. Personal control of desires and weaknesses. For this reason sat the Buddha on the skin of a flayed tiger. Only when one knows of the benefits and costs of control, and lack thereof, may one adequately apply control to ones life.

It is not evil, in this sense, to push the limits, and to fill oneself with impurities; it only shows inexperience, and ignorance of the Real Laws. The way of oppression is never the way, either individually, or in a society. Man must be allowed to manifest, such that he be allowed to grow. That being said, there comes a point when man, after having soiled himself in the pursuit of “Forbidden Fruit”, gives it up for higher purposes.

To obtain self-control is a long process. Many times it is not reached in one lifetime. Yet, it is the goal, as only a man who has obtained it may know. The rest truly lies in faith. It is this faith which creates religions. But man has innate necessities, and to believe is one of them, due to the abstract, mysterious nature of life, a conundrum which man may, by definition, not solve.

Self-control, then, is the goal, as known only by those who already know. The path to this self-control has already been described. But if it is the goal, and it may not be obtained in one simple lifetime, how then? And for this did the Buddha, and the Hindus, and all knowledgeable individuals express the idea of reincarnation. Repetition is the key to success.

Man has grown arrogant. This arrogance is a sign of ignorance, of innocence. An ignorant man doesn't see his own ignorance, and an ignorant man that does see his own ignorance, is a wise man. In this sense is an arrogant man, an arrogant society, ignorant by definition. What we do not see is as if dead to us. We do not see the millions of planets in the universe with liveable conditions, therefore we do not believe in them. The simple fact that we exist, means anyone, anywhere can exist. It is only our arrogance, ignorance which hinders this realization.

Man has grown ignorant. Forceful prohibition is not self-control. Even the most educated among us are ignorant. Why? Simply because we don't practice self-control. In the West, we are out of control, and out of balance. Nowhere in the world is man in a balanced, healthy state today. Some suffer material privation, some spiritual tribulation.

The West, the self-appointed drivers of culture, are living a cannibalistic, suicidal lifestyle today, at the turn of the millennium. In the name of the economy, we sell our people pure poison as food and entertainment. Perhaps some adults may realize the inherent danger in some of our practices, but children are generally helpless. Today we are driven by the lure of forbidden fruit. Sexually, we have forgotten the spirit, and prefer carnal gratification. Religiously, we believe absurd dogma which has been entirely severed from its source. We live in pursuit of power and wealth, forces which aid in the corruption of a weak, off-balance, misguided man.

It is our capitalistic economy which pushes us forward. This practice is in itself unbalanced and misleading, although the principle is entirely lawful. Money has become the lifeblood of our lives and times, a place once held by the thought and contemplation of the sacred. The economy, as an end unto itself, seeks to proselytize, in order to ensure its own survival. Naturally, this survival is bound to the individuals who drive, and benefit from it. In this cause is the sovereignty of man usurped, for the benefit of a self-interested system. This system then enters into conflict with reality, as both vie for available conviction. Our modern world is based on faith in the system, just as our belief in God.

In order to create this faith, reality must be manipulated, with the purpose of perpetuating the system. To perpetuate the system, thinking men are not necessary, rather, blind followers who support and uphold the system because they believe in it. Only at the highest echelons are men endowed with the power to affect society in a lawful, structured way. This is known as the “Status Quo”, and men from all walks of life are recruited to protect it, to drive it, to give it direction, but only under the guiding eye, and hand, of its creators, the true beneficiaries.

This may be a man, a nation, a race, a religion or creed. All will claim superiority in their own best interest. The systems, once they have been brought to life, truly live a life of their own. Many times they are based on one or several “truths”, which have been discovered by man, by chance or by providence. Only when man sees these “truths” rationally, is the system legitimized. For example, the “truth” of Jesus, or the “truth” of the superiority of capitalism as an economic system. However, after the passage of time and the handling by man, they invariably become corrupted. As we know, the Truth is independent of human observation. The original “truth” which was seen, rationalized, becomes lost, buried in dogma and human vanity. Through human tendencies.

Man may not handle the Truth. Although man is truth, truth lies also independent of man, of the observation of man. Truth may be seen by revelation, or by education, and is not “obvious”, as the most ignorant want to believe. The truth is Never obvious. It is only “obvious” when it has been manipulated, by man, to serve his purposes and interest. Then it ceases to be truth, and becomes something else: dogma, belief, system.

Our interested purpose today is the economy. Truth has been bent, broken, subjugated to its needs. It was paper money, a commodity without any inherent, proper value, which facilitated this step in history. What facilitated this step, in turn, was the discovery of the Americas.

The discovery of the Americas created “free, unlimited, unclaimed” natural resources. These resources facilitated the propulsion of the European into a prominent role on the world scene. It made the industrial, medical and information revolutions possible. The discovery of the Americas made the Europeans richer than ever before, richer, relatively, than any peoples in the recorded history of man.

This affluence, and power, was then transferred onto the entire white race, who saw it as their manifest destiny to rule first the Americas, and then, by extension, the entire globe. In order to complete their “mission”, in the end, they created paper money devoid of any intrinsic value. This was a deviation in the history of money throughout time. With this move, they created an unlimited money supply, a new caste of elite, i.e. bankers, and the ability to build and create with only the imagination as limitation.

They also created a system, and, to be sure, a faith-based system. It is faith in a piece of printed paper, without intrinsic value, which keeps our extremely inflated, bloated economy, and therefore lifestyles afloat. Ignorance of this fact is essential to the stability of the system. Why? Because the system, as we can see in our modern world through empirical evidence, creates winners and losers. The winners are few, and the losers are plenty.

Today, we hide this reality behind ignorant and perfidious religious and racial stereotypes. We give birth to, educate, and support a consumer society, as if they were truly batteries, to perpetuate the system. We ourselves, I mean you, and me, are a perpetuation of this system. The most dangerous weapon the system has, and uses, is the propagation of ignorance. The most dangerous enemy of the system is a thinking individual.

Control of the thinking process. Man cannot blot out the true purpose of man. The Truth may not be subjugated forever under a litany of “truths” propagated through propaganda, for it is a force independent of the interests of lowly, ignorant man, who kids only himself with his attempts to block out the sun with his finger.

What role does religion play in all this? Religion is also a game of power. It is utilized by the powerful, as a vehicle, as a scapegoat, as a tool, for whatever their needs. It is not a weakness of man, to believe, or to have a need to believe. It is a weakness of man to exploit. Man is weak. When he cannot control himself, his desires, his animal instincts, he instinctually seeks to control others. But man is more than animal, and it is precisely his animal instincts he is meant to overcome, in favour of what to those who know is obvious, and to those who don't know, is invisible, unknowable, non-existent.

Our society is a snake eating its tail, and it has come full circle. It is now a cannibal, feeding on its own flesh and blood. We feed on our own children when we sacrifice their future, sacrifice them, for our instant gratification today. They shall pay the heavy price of our misdeeds, but we shall pay them too. In our descent to our own debauch shall we lose that which is most precious to us: our conscience, our soul, our kids, our future as a species, ourselves.

Es geht um unsere eigene Existenz

We have condemned people to die through our own avarice. That is not the problem. The problem is that we do it under the banner of goodness and humanity. We do it in the name of progress, and of freedom. We develop and drop copious amounts of preemptive bombs in the name of peace. And it is peace; for some, and not for others. We have spread our disease, since the time of the discovery of the Americas, until the present day. We now know of its efficiency and effectiveness. In the process of planting the seed of discord, hatred, humiliation and poverty, we inherently lose a part of ourselves, as we must.

We preach the righteousness of our morality. We do this in order to obtain public support. This public support feeds us with wealth and power. Truly, it is righteousness which affords the power of a nation. There is an innate yearning in man, a knowledge, which seeks to reconfirm itself time and again: the superiority, and ultimate victory, of good over evil. A people will follow a government if it thinks the government is dedicated to doing good. The people will elect, support and uphold such a government. To this end do governments always portray themselves as innocent lambs oppose to the ferocity of their opponents.

Along this line of thinking, our modern government, with its crocodile tears and vampire fangs, poses a tremendous contradiction, a veritable slap in the face to reason, by its exclamations of victimhood and sensitivity. The sheer cheek of the world's foremost empire, and its allies, to then turn around, and blame their victims, and proceed to destroy them, poses a tremendous problem to all thinking men and women of our times, regardless of where they are. It is a sentence of suicide, when taking into consideration the known Laws of Nature.

First, we ate the children of the world. But, as any unbalanced creature, we are now a threat to ourselves. Look at the poisons we sell our own children to eat. Look at the garbage we feed through television, especially commercials, scientifically studied and devised to make lifelong, indebted consumers out of them, us. We foster a false sense of reality with regards to the world at large, and our place in it. We want to alter the genetic makeup of even our most important staple foods, in order to better harness their commercial value. Our illness is essential to the economy, and pharmaceuticals make sure we do not heal, in order to milk us like a cow. We wage war on the animal kingdom to feed our fat caprices. We export our “culture” with the force of the most advanced and devastating military technology in history, and advertise our military superiority as proof of our racial, religious and cultural superiority. Is this wrong? To the victor go the spoils, and we are indeed victors.

The proof is in the pudding.

Never has man lived such a consumerist, disposable life. In a sense, we sacrifice ourselves, when we fall into their trap willingly. There is a trap. At this time, it becomes every day more sophisticated and developed. It is now backed by “science”, and the reward it offers is enough to seduce the finest human talent. Obviously, they are very intelligent. The question is, are they intelligent enough?

Intelligent enough to realize wherein lies the trap, and intelligent enough to deny it in favor of a greater goal. The goal is to not sacrifice ones life to the self-interested system. Intelligent enough to maintain a conscious bead on the true prize of life, illumination, realization, growth. What gain you, if you gain the world, and lose your soul in so doing?

The peoples of the world are headed in opposite directions. And they are also headed in the same directions. Today’s rich truly own the entire world. They have obtained the power to do so, with the consent of their subjects. The rulers are every day fewer and richer. The poor people of the world are every day poorer, and more populous. Despite their numbers, obviously this system is not designed for them, by them. Throughout history, these conquered peoples of the world have remained passive, accepting their role, their fate, and the destiny of the conqueror, the spreader of civilization. He accepted his role because the spreader of civilization promised a beautiful future, despite his weapons and diseases. He was the highly-esteemed, world-renowned, pale-skinned, blue-eyed, bearded civilizer. But this man is known, as is his avarice. Now the people awaken, and they see that the busy bee has been busy building her nest from the nests of others. She has sinned in her greed and voracity. And she had been so promising...

Our sin is to continue to flaunt our morality in the face of our immoral world political activity. We are the builders of the world's arms. We are the scientists who place poisons in colorful, pretty boxes, cans and plastic bags, in order to create dependent and lifelong clients out of children. We fill their heads with hype, we offer the world from the inside of a colorful, toxic bag. We promise a life of happiness and plenty, if only you buy our product. We buy human gladiators in the form of athletes, and we use them to mercilessly peddle our useless, addiction causing wares. We make addicts of our society.

Is there honor in this? Is there superiority and moral authority? If you think so, then you are one of the benefited from this system. There is no honor in this, no superiority. It is all empty bravado designed to propagate a favorable public opinion, in order to continue doing it.

Contrary to popular belief, Americas problems did not begin with Bush. He is simply a self-fulfilling prophecy. Americas problems begin with its inception. It was a racial arrogance, exacerbated by apparent eventualities, a manifest destiny, which marked the birth of this nation, indeed of this continent. Was that enough to doom it? No. The betterment of humanity is always a worthy cause. Maybe the European settlers prospered not because they were superior, but because the time of the conquered peoples to go had come. It amounts to the same thing; America has been charmed until this day.

But the tide always changes, the tables turn, all good things must come to an end. America is no longer charmed, her decay and corruption will be exposed.
