

America's roots January 2008

A H.A.L.O. document

© RFSN 2010

Every generation blames the one before. I blame none, I just don't want to make the same mistakes. It is my right, as a man, to awaken and to take my life into my own hands. It is the right of every man. No, more than a right, it is our duty; a duty to the legacy of our species. It may be only a couple more generations, and then man forgets (except those who remember their history), and begins anew from scratch.

Europe has gotten progressively richer and richer since the discovery of the Americas. Along with especially North American progress, all of Europe has benefited and prospered. In relation to the feudalistic societies of our feudalistic past, today's civilized masses live a radically different, and economically freer reality than their forebears. Africa and South America in contrast have not yet recovered from the Western invasions of the last 500+ years. The eastern civilizations represent themselves only a fraction of their former ostentation and grandeur. It can be said that the time of the Western man came, and this one took his opportunity when it was presented him.

The white populations today are like scared children. It is an ancestral inferiority complex from which all Europeans, and those of European blood suffer. It is this which causes their necessity to conquer the world, and their games of racial, political and cultural superiority, manifest by our mindless urge to forge ahead at any and all cost. Like a scared animal, for reasons it can no longer remember. Our society is new, that of the Northern European. The American people are brand new. It is a work in progress, and there can be no doubt that America in 50 years will be a very different place than it is today.

Europe itself, on the other hand, retains more tradition. It is awakening, along with the multi-millenary societies of the East. They remember much more of their history than we do. All are awakening, the cards have been dealt, the seats at the table have been peopled, and the game of cards begins. Who has an ace up their sleeve? Where is it that our modern day aristocrats want to lead us, and do we have any faith that they even know? What game are they playing? Where are we going with the wanton destruction of our planet? Where are we going with the psycho-somatic interference of societies of all places and ages, beginning with our own? What do we want, when we make the arms industry the mainstay of our economy? Arms to back our leadership? They are leading us somewhere! But, who is “they”, who is “us”, and where is “somewhere”?

Well, very simply, leadership has fallen into the hands of the masses, and America is their champion. The Aristocrats were stripped of their power in favour of democratic governments. The Aristocrats were the ruling caste, born and raised to lead, and the masses were born to be led, incapable of leading themselves. This is a very plausible theory, and has been voiced in the past by various philosophers, most notably, for me, Ortega y Gasset. The masses have taken over, and so it would seem. But is it true? Perhaps the Aristocracy has simply exchanged hands. What is certain, is that man is a political animal. Due to his many, if at times dangerous gifts, man has the need to organize himself.

What is not told, is that in our quest for total world domination, we disturbed and laid low ancient and delicate, and supremely social and beautiful forms of economy, such as the system of reciprocity and redistribution of the Americas. But one time had come to an end, and another was just beginning. The white man appeared on the scene to claim what was rightfully his, granted by, as tradition held it, divine right. Since the time of John Dee and Thomas Kelly, when the Spanish armada was destroyed by a much smaller British fleet, have the British Empire and her colonies ruled the Earth. The modern day inheritor of this English legacy is the United States of America, lone world superpower.

The Americas were formed by strongmen. These strong men made themselves powerful by the strengths of their arms and will. In every case was administration overlooked, and in every case was a “might makes right” political doctrine adopted. This condition, naturally, became a tradition, and institutionalized and lives until the present day in the form of the outward-looking economic structures of today’s American governments. Export of natural resources, a minimum of actual industry (relative to the industrialized world), minimal internal social politics, neglect of national infrastructure.

The rule of “Corporatocracy”, with the bottom line being measured in one-sided terms. Food source and media manipulation. Etc, etc...

The wave of the industrial revolutions and demographic expansion was ridden on the American back. The appropriation of heretofore undreamed of quantities of natural and human resources allowed a previously stagnant Europe to explode onto the forefront of world affairs, and onto the brink of world domination. Of the seven continents, 4 are directly western ruled (North and South America, Europe, Australia), one is uninhabited (Antarctica), one is politically insignificant on a world level (Africa), and one is home to two of the worlds existing, albeit sleeping behemoth civilizations (Asia, and in particular India and China). Housed in this one remaining continent however, is approximately 2/3 of the world population.

There are big differences between the Northern and Southern peoples of Europe. The northerners have a more refined sense of community, obeying the simple and complex laws of community to a high degree, while the southern people exercise a more individual right. This can be seen in art, sport, society, on the streets, in restaurants, movies, everywhere. A German pedestrian will wait at a street crossing with a red light for 5 minutes, even though there may be no car in sight, in either direction, no witnesses, nothing, other than the red light. A southerner would be hard pressed to do the same. The Spanish Flamenco is a dance of individual pain, suffering, honor and pride, while the German folk music displays a more communal feeling of green prairies and village life. A German could never be a Bull fighter, has no need to puff out his chest in his individual victory.

The U.S. was founded on a northern model. It is the working together, communally, for the same goal that has put them atop world politics and power. This, along with at best lopsided, at worst lawless foundations has propelled the ascension of the northern male to the position of master and lord of our modern global experience.

Of course we believe in the will of man, but is a mistake to leave out the will of God in the affairs of man. The time of the native American had come to an end, and as a result, he was almost effortlessly defeated by the conquering European. The European conqueror, far from the interested and controlling eye of established European aristocracy, engendered a lawless world where only the strongest or wisest could survive.

It would be a matter of time before America gained independence from Europe, due to natural forces of politics and economy. Strong men assumed power. A new aristocracy was born, with new titles, like President, Chairman, and so on.

In the south, individual goals were followed, less was built in community. The people, however, were spared. The results are evident in their current existences as nations and peoples. Memories become traditions, traditions become jealously guarded, and little cliques of adherents are formed. Tradition is used to validate all aspects of life, but this adherence to tradition causes a resistance to change, something which bothers the northerner to a lesser degree. He was and is ready to write them all anew in this quest for dominion.

The Americas have embraced change as their greatest tradition. Their underlying roots, however, they will never forget. The Americas are, after all, extensions of Europe and their empires. The people have moved on, but the fact that the Americas are of European descent should not be a mystery. This is true for all American nations, but much more so for the ruling elite of North America. These have grown more arrogant, due to their perceived superiority derived from their implacable modernity. As agents of change, they are accustomed to having impact, which of course grates on southern sensibilities. And yet, all of Europe benefits from European endeavors, northern or southern.