Americans are different than Europeans, but as mentioned, the elite maintain their ancestral, racial roots, which unifies them to these Europeans. This allows them to partake of a racial conscience from its root. In America, with the profound racial mixture of its people, ideas as well as blood, combined with the proper energetic power of the continent itself imbued in the people by virtue of being born there has caused its people to be indeed different to any other extra-continental races. Americans are indeed Americans, with their own stereotypes, customs, mannerisms, and ways of perceiving themselves and the world.

Spain decreed royal protection over the natives found in the Americas. England did nothing of the kind. As a result, in North America, colonials acted without royal supervision, while in Latin America, the long arm of the Spanish law imposed itself. As a result from this, in the North, the Native was finished off. In Central and South America, though mistreated and disrespected, something of their humanity was preserved. That is to say, they were permitted to maintain their lives. In addition, it is important to note that English and Spanish settlers had different goals in mind. In the north, the land was viewed as the main attraction, while in central and south, a nagging national debt to the Northern Europeans, who were in turn running a massive deficit with Asia, forced the Spanish to view bullion as their main incentive for the American enterprise.
